ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM

2 Awortwi, Nicholas

Building new competencies for government administrators and managers in an era of public sector reforms: The case of Mozambique.

International Review of Administrative Sciences, 76(4), 2010(Dec): p.723-748.

African public administration today is mixed with elements of the old bureaucratic model continuing alongside the new public management (NPM). The increasing application of the NPM approach has placed public administration and management systems in the spotlight and raised a number of challenges. Among them are the relevance of policy importation and the availability of civil servants with the reforms introduced. Using the case of Mozambique, this article shows that implementation of public sector reforms has brought in its trail considerable gaps between reform strategies and the competences needed to execute them. Convinced that competences of public administrators are a vital prerequisite for the success of reforms, the government of Mozambique has instituted a series of training programmes to provide the kind of competences that would reflect the new demands and realities facing the public sector. Though it is too early to expect results, the article concludes that the technical, managerial the leadership skills of public administrators and managers are being improved through better training curricula than were provided in the past. - Reproduced.

Administrative obstacles to reform in the Democratic Republic of Congo.

International Review of Administrative Sciences, 76(4), 2010(Dec): p.702-722.

Emerging from two major wars (1996-97 and 1998-2002), the Democratic Republic of Congo is one of Africa's most notoriously failed states. Since President Joseph Kabila came to power in 2001, the international community has invested significantly in efforts to rebuild the Congo. State-building efforts, however, have not achieved the expected results. International partners and the Congolese authorities share responsibility for failing to bring about genuine political change and institutional reconstruction. The former have underestimated the complexities of Congolese political culture while the latter deliberately hamper reform. Administrative weaknesses and the particular nature of public service provision in Congo constitute overwhelming obstacles to state-building. After presenting the different logics that motivate state-building and an overview of recent political history, the Congolese administrative reality will be discussed. Analysis will follow, revealing that implementing meaningful reform under the current framework is improbable. - Reproduced.

Redefining political-administrative relationships in South Africa.

International Review of Administrative Sciences, 76(4), 2010(Dec): p.676-701.

This article is an overview of shifting political-administrative relationships in South Africa, with particular reference to growing politicization (partisan control of the bureaucracy). Studies of politicization of public services are important because political involvement in management has often led to negative effects on service delivery. The article sets out a theoretical framework for political-administrative relationships, examining the growing politicization of public services, the impact of New Public Management (NPM) and political-administrative relationships in developing countries. It the looks at political-administrative relationships in South Africa, including the apartheid history, the development of a new framework in the democratic South Africa and politicization in the staffing of the public service. It examines three functional areas - the decentralization of powers, contract appointments and performance management - and discusses the implications of this changing framework for service delivery. The methodology consisted of interviews with a number of senior government officials, including three current directors-general and a former Minister for the Public Service and Administration, an analysis of government legislation, Public Service Commission (PSC) data including surveys, unpublished data of the Department of Public Service and Administration (DPSA), policy papers of the African National Congress (ANC) and an Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) study of political involvement in bureaucracies. The article concludes that growing politicization of the public service has contributed to poor service delivery, and that the South African government needs to place greater emphasis on merit as the basis for appointments and promotions. - Reproduced.

Civil service pay reforms in Africa.

International Review of Administrative Sciences, 76(4), 2010(Dec): p.632-652.

African civil services have been subjected to perpetual rounds of reforms that have in many cases aggravated problems because the core issue of how to pay for quality civil service on a sustained basis has not been given the much-deserved emphasis. Many African countries have lost the capacity to pay for a high quality civil service due in part to the poverty of their economies, the structure of politics and administration, globalization, and wrong-headed reform programmes. A few countries in the region have adopted a strategic performance management approach to civil service reform that aligns the diversity of reform efforts in the public service. This strategy focuses attention on performance and productivity, the attraction and retention of skilled staff and senior management who in turn oversee a new culture of accountable use of resources for results. All of these are core to improving pay and the quantity, quality and performance of the civil service and the state in the region. - Reproduced.

To cater to the ever-increasing need for strategically steering the organisation's managerial practices into strategic management, the most effective way is to integrate the HRD policy and practices with organisational strategy while aligning them with global-arching human resource management. Organisations in both public and private sectors require a critical group of positive factors concerning effective management of human resources to successfully execute their organization strategies and goals. It involves the analysis of a myriad of internal and external environmental factors contingent to the organisation, followed by a strategic approach to influencing key stakeholders and the formulation of strategic HRD policies and plans in parallel with the organisation's business strategy. Drawing from the few key research works available, this article explores the need for integrating the HRD policy and practices with the organisational strategy and assesses the process of integration, so that it warrants that the organization effectively exercise Strategic Management. Having discussed implications of HRD-Organization strategy integration practices, the article concludes that the organisations should make their HRD function more strategic in nature. - Reproduced.

The Government of Nepal (GoN) has focused on poverty reduction as an overall development strategy especially rural development. Good Governance has been regarded as a focal strategy for poverty reduction. National Planning Commission and different organizations have been identified weak governance as a major obstacle in achieving the poverty reduction in Nepal. Rural areas have high concentration of population and poor. Sustainable rural development cannot be imagined without poverty reduction. Simultaneously poverty reduction program cannot achieve expected outcomes without good governance. In this context, this paper has overviewed the concept of three dynamic elements; analyze the prevailing context of Nepal; forward good governance as a dynamic solution, outline existing issues of good governance and its solution. Good governance is foremost to initiate effective poverty reduction leading toward sustainable rural development thus it should be adopted more institutionally than mechanical application. In spite of sufficient legal and organizational foundations; implementation and people oriented supply are weak. This could be achieved through bureaucratic professionalism, and it requires political commitment to inject essence of good governance in Nepalese institution and local governance. - Reproduced.

The concept of Swaraj does not merely address the question of self-rule versus foreign rule or state rule versus anarchy, rather it questions the very presuppositions of sovereignty as constituted in the modern nation state. In that way Gandhi not only presents a fundamentally different theory of the relation between civil society and the state but also of the two constitutive principles of modern theories of sovereignty - supreme authority and territory. - Reproduced.

How can 'beautiful' be 'backward'? Tribes of India in a long-term demographic perspective.

Economic and Political Weekly, 46(4), 2011(22 Jan): p.42-50.

Although the demography of tribal people cannot loom large in India's overall demographic scene, demographic features in tribal societies have often been distinct and distinguished both in historical and comparative perspectives. This evaluation of the overall demographic features and their common socio-cultural underpinnings in the tribal population focuses on the nature and strength of the well-known connection between socio-cultural milieus and demographic behaviour. It highlights the Indian notion of "tribe" and its comparative position vis a-vis the mainstream since the late last century, especially in the contemporary context of development and globalisation. - Reproduced.

urban renewal, with a focus on inclusive development of urban centres, is one of the thrust areas in the National Common Minimum Programme and accordingly the Jawaharlal Nehru National Urban Renewal Mission was launched. This paper analyses the present urban development policies with a focus on coverage at the state and size-class levels, the extent of equity and effectiveness of the programme. It works out the interdependencies of infrastructural investment in the public sector with those of socio-economic indicators. The study shows that only 58% of the urban population has been covered under JNNURM, the coverage being high in the developed states and metropolitan cities. Of the 5,161 towns/cities, 4,207 are yet to be covered. An analysis of the funding pattern clearly brings out the big city bias. The phenomenon of large-scale underutilisation of the funds and inability of the smaller urban local bodies to prepare detailed project reports and generate matching resources can be addressed by making special provisions for unconditional general grants, especially those in the economically backward states. This will certainly help in making the growth process more inclusive, where the urban poor would be partners in the developmental process. -
